Being a Twin

Twins, as we all know, are two babies produced by one pregnancy. When they develop from the same egg, they are usually considered "identical" and have almost all the same characteristics. (Scientists have discovered, though, that they are not "exactly" the same.) When they develop from separate eggs, they are usually considered "non-identical" and might look quite different.

Although the number of twins in the US has been increasing – from fewer than 2 in every 100 births in 1980 to more than 3 in 2023 – it is still relatively low. So people still seem very curious about twins: What is it like to be so similar to another person? How does it feel to know that someone shares your (almost) exact likeness? For me, it is always a little difficult to answer those questions, since I have only known life as a twin.

My sister Claudia and I are identical twins. The likeness between us is very strong, and our features and build are pretty similar. In fact, when we were children, we sometimes had fun pretending we were the other one at school just to confuse people. But nowadays, for example, we each tend to wear very different styles and I would say we have pretty distinct tastes in clothes.

However, we do sometimes think in similar ways as well. For instance, when Claudia and I graduated from high school, we both decided to go to the same college and eventually do the same job. Some people suggested that a lack of confidence or of personality caused us to make such decisions. But that is not true. We both sincerely wanted to follow the same career path.

All things considered, though, I wonder whether my relationship with Claudia is actually much different from that between brothers and sisters who are very close. Don't they also have so many things in common and often share the same views on life?
